

CADE TOMPKINS PROJECTS

Bruton exhibit at Cade Tompkins

"R-Lily," a painting by Donnamarca Bruton

October 10, 2013

BILL VAN SICLEN

Just as some musicians have perfect pitch, some artists are blessed with perfect touch — the ability to render even complex shapes and images with an almost effortless ease.

Donnamaria Bruton, a Providence painter and longtime RISD professor who died last year, had that kind of loose, free-flowing talent. Whether she was painting a realistic scene, such as a still life or a landscape, or (more often) working in a more abstract style, she rarely made a bad move.

All of which makes the current exhibit of Bruton's work at Cade Tompkins Projects a must-see event for local art lovers. A fan of Abstract Expressionist painters such as Cy Twombly and Willem de Kooning, yet with a strong realistic streak, Bruton often mixed recognizable images with more abstract markings and doodles. A good example is "Untitled Landscape IV," in which a series of small squiggle-filled "islands" appear to float on a shimmering pinkish-gold sea.

The result, like many of Bruton's works, strikes a Zen-like balance between inner and outer experience — part memory, part dream.